IN A SWAMP BAYOU.

Lots of Fish to Be Caught if You do Not Mind Mosquitoes.

(New York Sun.)

It might be inferred that a man willing to get out on a Louisiana bayou in August, and endure the heat and the clouds of mosquitoes is a being without nerves to telegraph pain to his brain, but the fact is that black belt southerners are used to these conditions. Some of them rather like heat and mosquitoes and others do not mind them.

If a man can stand it there is a good deal on and in the bayou to repay him. The surface is dark and looks wet, though it is not. From bushes whose roots are in the water graceful mosses are pendent, deadly but interesting.

On a sandbank, fifty yards away, lies a thing which a visitor would call a half-dead drifting log, but it is an alligator seven feet long. Every jutting stump are turtles also asleep, and as the boat nears they roll off one by one in a series of silent slides.

Mocking birds may be seen moving quickly, but they do not sing in the heat of the day. Indeed, there is no bird of that latitude which does not sing the dove, if its melancholy cooing may be called singing, and this voice of plaintiveness is practically incessant, sounding through all of the wood aisles.

The skunks steal down slyly on a fishing expedition; the coon, though a night hunter mostly, may be abroad in the daytime, digging for crawfish; the deer will come often to drink, galloping back fast into the dark shadows to get rid of the insects; the black bear is also after fish when he cannot get honey; brilliant-hued little flycatchers, not a note of music among them, make small black dots in the green moss, green branches, and insect life has a thousand fiery, gaudy forms.

As for the fishing itself, there is plenty of it. The swamp bayous are not much haunted by men with hooks and lines. Occasionally negroes come down for catfish and croppies, but it is apt to be two miles to the nearest plantation quarters and that is a long way for a negro to travel. Green bass, locally called green trout, are in these waters, big fellows, many of them, and the lordly white perch, silver from nose to tail, the most beautiful of all southern fresh water fishes, may be yanked from the depths if the bait be a lively minnow.

The jackfish, too, that miniature pike, champion ravenous for its inches of the bayou, will strike savagely at worms, minnows, crabs, or anything that it thinks is good to eat, though it is most apt to be found in numbers back near the hills, where some clear pine woods stream debouches into the bayou.

Possibly there is no other part of the world in which so many fish may be taken by one or two men. It is entirely possible for them to load a fourteen-foot boat in a day using only hooks and line. Just how many they can catch will depend entirely upon how fast they can take the fish from the hooks, rebait them, and drop them back into the bayou; also upon how long they can stand it.

The bayou runs between walls of woods so woven together with vines that there is a foliage almost impenetrable to the air and the things of the air. Of course, no breeze may blow over the water unless it comes down the alley of green, and so this winds and drifts that no current lasts long.

Four feet above the water, massed in by the opposing lines of trees, there is an even heat. No man has ever taken a thermometer to the surface of a swamp bayou because the result might scare him too much, but it is certainly the temperature is not less than 125 degrees, and it may be 140. Men stand and endure this for hours, however, and have fun at it.

FISHING UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

Fisherman Tells How He Captured the Giant of White River.

(Denver Times.)

"A giant willow with numberless drooping branches rose at the very edge of the White river and cast a great mantle of green boughs over the swimming stream, as if to protect it and its trout," said Frank Bishop, who with his wife has returned from a visit with George W. Haid of Rifle, who took his guests on a camping trip on banks of the White river, about twelve miles north of Meeker.

"I had fished along the river with good luck before reaching this place, which, it seemed, a fly could not penetrate. Reaching the green willow's foliage was a fine, deep pool and a giant willow convinced me that there were big trout lying in its shadows. Yet the limbs trailed in the water. I looked at the situation from every side. There seemed to be no chance of getting the waters under the tree. Even as I looked a trout leaped within the guarded space and the ever widening circle he made reached the opposite bank where I stood.

"I made several casts at the edge of the trailing willow, but without getting a rise. It was no use, I must seek nearer the shore. I made another careful inspection of the tree, and found one small hole in the mass of leaves and branches. It was but a foot wide at the water and grew narrower to the top. It was a mere little gap in the green wall I struck firmly. The fly I measured the distance carefully with my eye and made calculations accordingly. A sharp breeze was blowing down stream. The water ruffled on the tallest, provoking over rocks and logs, but far inside the calm pool lay undisturbed and placidly mirrored the tree above. I tied on a small brown hackle and made a cast at the tiny opening amid the foliage. The fly fell short. Again I tried and this time my hook caught the overhanging branch above the hole. I had not allowed myself to jerk until the small brown fly, the shank of the hook and then tied on another fly—a black gnat. I made several practice casts downstream to get
